Dubois Regiment for the space of five months on the first of June he repaired to New York where he was remaining where the British fleet passed through the Narrows, and was also there at the time of the declaration of Independence, after which he was ordered to Long Island when the American Army was encamped on a peninsula near the village of Brooklyn, under the command of General Sullivan.

The British forces being under the command of Lord Howe on Long Island, he was engaged in the battle between the last mentioned forces & recollects the circumstance of Lord Sterling with a number of his soldiers being taken as prisoners of war, by the British this circumstances he thinks happened about night & in the night he retreated with the army to New York, where they remained until the British forces under General Howe showed disposition of attacking that place when he was ordered with the army to retreat to Kings Bridge, he recollects among his companions at this time.

Declarant employed William McCall as his substitute to perform the services required by his enlistment who actually joined the army as such substitute & faithfully served therein until Feb 1778, when he die with the Small Pox at Valley Forge.

Notwithstanding declarant having employed Such substitute, he entered the army himself as a volunteer under the same Capt. & served under him until he was killed & continued to serve in the same company, under the command of Capt. Subsequent to this declarant was a militia man in Capt. Yates Company, Col. Yates Regiment at intervals for one or two months at a time, he recollects being ordered out in the night time by Col. Yates to repair to Saratoga, there being in circulation a report that the British were in that place, but the alarm proving false. They tarried there but a few days, & then returned home. He was often on a scouting expedition & frequently called to repair to some post for the defence thereof until the close of the war.
